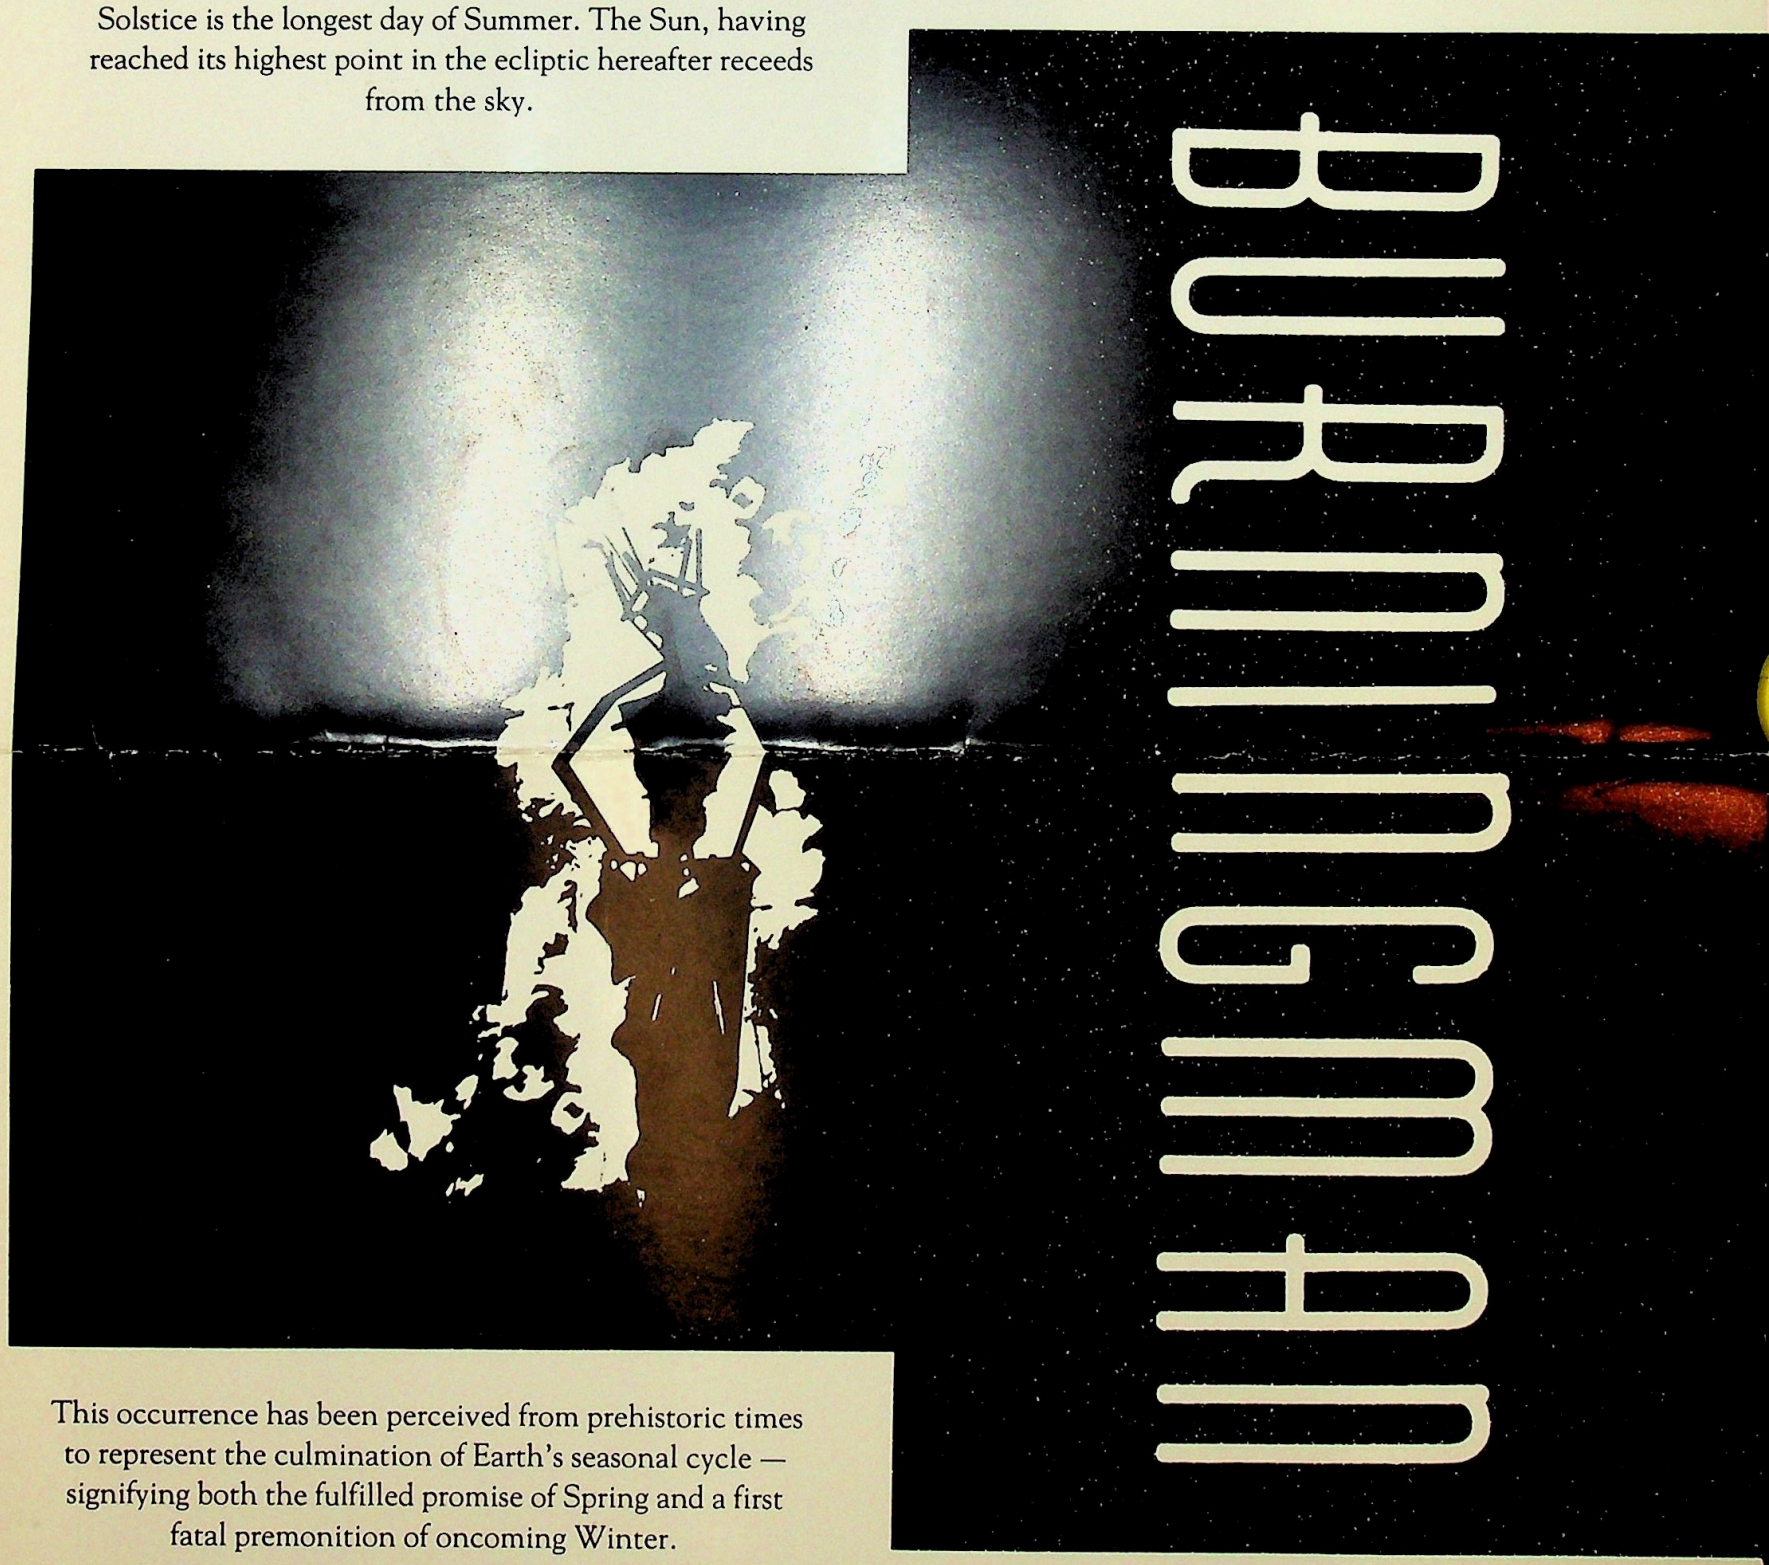
Marking the mid-point of the Solar year, the Solstice is the longest day of Summer. The Sun, having reached its highest point in the ecliptic hereafter receeds from the sky.



This occurrence has been perceived from prehistoric times to represent the culmination of Earth's seasonal cycle — signifying both the fulfilled promise of Spring and a first fatal premonition of oncoming Winter.

The erection and destruction of a monumental human figure is meant to dramatize this passage in Time. Our aim is to inspire awe — a reverence verging on fear and delight.
